A review of the UK Cloud Infrastructure, DevOps, and Software Engineering landscape heading into 2024

Sean McCormack

Principal Consultant - Software Engineering

The cloud infrastructure, DevOps, and software engineering landscape in the UK and Europe are poised for significant evolution in 2024. The transition from revolutionary to evolutionary innovation is marked by a focus on migrating and re-architecting workloads to the cloud, with an emphasis on simplifying interactions and reducing cognitive load for teams.

Artificial Intelligence (AI) and Large Language Models (LLMs) are expected to play a pivotal role, particularly in addressing cognitive overload and supporting tasks like incident management, ticketing systems, and code generation. Major cloud providers such as Microsoft, Google, and AWS are integrating AI into their products and services, indicating a substantial industry investment in AI technology.

Furthermore, the low-code and no-code domains are also being impacted by AI-based products, fostering collaboration between business users and software engineering teams. Platform engineering is evolving towards simplification and value delivery, adopting a platform-as-a-service mindset, and in turn the role of platform engineering teams is shifting from complex infrastructure management to becoming service providers focused on user satisfaction and value creation.

With confidence improving across the tech industry in the UK and Europe, and with the challenges that plagued 2023 waning, it is fantastic to hear of all the investments being planned for 2024.
